

Dear FCC.

I believe that an ISP has a right to receive profits from its investments. I also believe that in exchange for these profits, they have a duty to provide a quality service to their constituents. I further believe that government regulation should serve in the best interest of the public (by the people, for the people, you know how it goes).

The internet is the largest "public" library that has ever been created in the history of mankind. To increase the ability of profit seeking entities to regulate access to that library would be significantly damaging to the American Economy.

Many successful companies in our era have been formed in garages by American Innovators, using their own wits and the information they have gained in their travels. Allowing the limitation of access to information and diversity of information in this current age would create a situation where the american innovator has a significant handicap compared to territorial zones which have better protection on access to information.

A move that allows ISP's to block or throttle certain sites has increased ability to affect the political domain through favorable exposure to selected information sources. Which can have an exacerbating effect on the abilities of ISP's to affect political regulation in their own domains.

Additionally regulations offering a "pay to play" fast lane would detriment many companies who rely on internet services in order to operate, and would only offer cannibalistic growth to companies that are looking to increase market share as opposed to expanding market size.

Finally, I believe that there is a single internet that is a precious and precarious artifact created over the past generation. This creation is worthy of protection, and should be kept open and neutral for those who would use it in any form. The rules governing access to the internet should be universally applied to any medium used to access it, be that desktop, mobile phone, or future method.

Thank you kindly for your time and consideration in this matter.

Sincerely,

John Moody
Electrical Engineer and Jobless American
Phone : 804-240-6536
Email : Moodymusicman@gmail.com